The elections are over and the balance of power has shifted in Washington, D.C. Significant parts of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (PPACA) have been implemented, but major additional requirements are scheduled to take effect over the next few years. The Republicans have vowed to repeal all or part of the law, and have even filed their own lawsuit over it, but what parts of the law have the greatest possibility of actually changing? Meanwhile, the Supreme Court has agreed to hear another case that could significantly affect applicability of the law. At issue is whether premium tax credits are only permitted in states that are running their own exchange – a significant issue, since only one-third of the states are running their own exchanges. While no one knows what the Supreme Court will decide, how could this affect businesses and individuals?

This webinar will cover what is happening in Washington, D.C., the possibility of changes, some of the reasons behind the legislative agendas, and what employers can expect over the coming months.

PRESENTER

Jessica Waltman – Senior Vice President of Government Affairs for the National Association of Health Underwriters (NAHU)

Jessica coordinates all of NAHU’s legislative and regulatory efforts to advance the interests of professional health insurance producers. She oversees NAHU’s analysis of state and federal policy proposals and coordinates the association’s internal policy working groups and task forces. She serves as the primary drafter of NAHU’s position statements and white papers and is a frequent speaker on state and federal level legislative and regulatory issues that affect health insurance.
